What this guide is about

When someone’s died, sorting out wills and estates might be the last thing on your mind, or it could be a welcome distraction. However, if someone has asked you to be the executor of their estate, after their death there are things you’ll have to do.

In this guide we’ll explain what’s expected of you, the steps you need to follow and where to find help if you need it.

For more detailed information on the topics covered in this guide, see our factsheet Dealing with an estate.

This symbol indicates where information differs for Wales and Northern Ireland. As far as possible, the information in this guide is applicable across the UK.
Deciding to be an executor
What is an executor?
Anyone who makes a will must name an executor. An executor is legally responsible for handling a person’s estate (their money, property and possessions) when they die and for carrying out the instructions in their will.

Who can be an executor?
You can act as an executor even if you’re going to inherit something from the will. In fact, an executor is often a spouse, child or other family member. The person making the will can appoint up to four executors, so you can share the responsibility with others, but all decisions must then be made jointly. There can often be at least two executors appointed, for example a family member and a professional, such as a solicitor, just in case one dies or is otherwise unable to carry out their duties.

What do executors do?
• They make sure all property owned by the person who’s died is secure as soon as possible after the death.
• They collect all assets and money due to the estate of the person who’s died (including property).
• They pay any outstanding taxes and debts (out of the estate).
• They distribute the estate to the people who are entitled to it under the terms of the will.
• They arrange the funeral, if the will contains specific instructions for them to do so.

Before you agree to be an executor
Being an executor isn’t easy. It can take up a lot of your time and might be the last thing you feel like doing when you’re grieving, so think carefully before you agree to take on the responsibility.
Can I change my mind?

Once you’ve accepted the role, you have several options if you later change your mind:

• If you can, talk about your decision with the person who appointed you so they can change the name of the executor in their will.

• Immediately after the person has died, speak to the Principal Probate Registry (page 20) or to a legal professional about your options.

• After the person has died, but before you’ve started to deal with the estate, you may need to complete a form of Renunciation.

• After the person has died and when you’ve started to deal with the estate, you cannot step down unless you have a good reason, such as ill health or a family emergency.

If you live in Northern Ireland, you can only appoint someone to act in your place if you are incapable of dealing with your own affairs.

An executor’s key duties

Being an executor can involve a lot of time and work during a difficult period. The tasks involved can sometimes take months to complete, so think carefully before you agree to take on the role. If you’ve been asked to be an executor it can seem daunting, but this section talks you through some of the key duties. It’s important to note that not every duty below will be relevant to you and your situation.

The tasks most associated with being an executor include:

• registering the death
• getting copies of the will
• arranging the funeral
• valuing the estate
• taking responsibility for property and post
• applying for probate
• sorting out finances
• distributing the estate
• paying any Inheritance Tax
• dealing with assets.

Good to know

A solicitor can be especially useful in helping you with your role as an executor. Find a solicitor by contacting the Law Society (page 19) or Solicitors for the Elderly (page 20).
Registering the death

If necessary, register the death and notify the person’s GP of their death. This isn’t something an executor is required to do but you may have to do it if there’s no one else who can.

It’s a good idea to pay for several certified copies of the death certificate now, as it will be more expensive to request additional copies later. Unless you’re employing a solicitor to deal with the estate, you might need a copy for each company that holds money or other items of value that belonged to the person. These companies are sometimes known as asset holders and usually include the bank, TV licensing, insurance providers and landlord.

“After my friend passed away, it was a tough time for everyone, but I made sure I registered the death.”

Norman, 73

Next steps

Contact the Tell Us Once service in England and Wales (page 20) to report a death to most government departments in one go. This service isn’t available in every local council area or in Northern Ireland, so you may need to inform departments directly.
Getting copies of the will

It can be difficult to talk about death, so you might not know how the person who died would like their estate to be distributed. This will all be outlined in their will.

- Find out where the most up-to-date version of their will is held and get the original (or a copy if that isn’t possible). You must provide a death certificate and proof of your identity. Any other executors must confirm they are happy for you to have the will.

- Make copies of the will for co-executors and beneficiaries, and then put the original away in a safe place. Don’t tamper with the original or copies in any way (this includes adding staples or paper clips).
Arranging the funeral

If the person who has died left instructions for their funeral, it’s your responsibility to ensure they’re followed. For some executors, arranging the funeral can be a welcome distraction from their grief and sadness, but for others it can be incredibly difficult.

• Don’t be afraid to ask family and friends for support, both practical and emotional. Many tasks such as calling people to make arrangements can be delegated, and you may feel better if you can talk to someone about what you’re going through.

• If there is a funeral plan, contact the provider as soon as you can. When you receive an invoice for the funeral, you can take it to the person’s bank or building society along with a death certificate, the will and your identification. You should be issued with a cheque for the amount due, made payable to the funeral director.

• Inform family, friends and work colleagues of the death. You could put a notice in the local or national newspapers with funeral details so that people can attend if they wish.
Valuing the estate

The executor needs to value the estate of the person who’s died. Start with everything they owned at the time of their death. This includes property, possessions and money (minus any debts, such as a mortgage, loans and bills). The estate may also include assets held jointly with others.

It is important that you check how these assets were held to see if they form part of the deceased person’s estate. For assets such as property or land, you should get a professional valuation. HMRC recommends having items worth more than £500 valued professionally.

You don’t need to value the property straight away after someone dies, unless the estate owes Inheritance Tax (see page 16). If it does, you’ll need to send Inheritance Tax forms within one year and start paying tax by the end of the sixth month after the person died. You can make a payment before you finish valuing the estate.

You can report the value of the estate online at www.gov.uk/valuing-estate-of-someone-who-died/tell-hmrc-estate-value.

Next steps

Read our guide When someone dies for support and advice on the practical things that need doing when someone has died, including sorting finances.
Taking responsibility for property and post

It can feel strange taking responsibility for someone's property so soon after their death. It can bring to mind a lot of memories and bring up a lot of emotions, but if their property is unoccupied it’s best to secure it and inform the insurers as soon as possible.

The estate itself may have to replace the person who’s died as the policy holder, and the insurer may ask you to make regular checks on the condition of the property while it’s unoccupied. You may have to get a new home insurance policy if the current one doesn’t cover an empty property.

To stop postal deliveries, contact the Bereavement Register (page 19).
Applying for probate

A grant of probate gives you the legal right to deal with someone’s estate.

You may not need one for a small estate (usually less than £5,000 in England and Wales, or less than £10,000 in Northern Ireland). In this case, write to the deceased person’s bank or building society.

To apply via post you’ll need to complete form PA1 and the relevant Inheritance Tax form. Call the Probate and Inheritance Tax Helpline (page 20) to request the forms, then send these to the local probate registry along with:

- a certified copy of the death certificate
- the original will, plus three copies
- the fee of £215.

In Northern Ireland, contact the Probate Office (page 20) to get the correct forms and arrange an appointment. The fee for this is £200.

Go to www.apply-for-probate.service.gov.uk/start-eligibility to apply online. You can pay online and won’t need to send a copy of the will. But you will be asked how many copies of the grant you’ll need.

When you receive a grant of probate, make several copies, as you will need them for asset holders. Send an official copy (as issued by the Probate Registry) with instructions to asset holders. When the assets are released, pay the proceeds into the executor’s account (except for anything that has been specifically passed on to someone else).

You must pay any Inheritance Tax due before applying for the grant of probate (see page 16 for more information).
Sorting out finances

You’ll need to send an original death certificate to any asset holders, such as banks, building societies and insurance companies. You should also ask for any direct debits to be cancelled and find out the account balances and investment values on the date of the death.

• You should stop the payment of salary, pensions and state benefits to the person who has died. Advise the issuers of their credit cards, passport, driver’s licence and TV licence of the death and act on their instructions.

• Request information on any debts, and any overpayments made to them. Check through their paperwork looking for bills or statements and contact organisations, such as energy suppliers or the local council, to ask if the deceased person owed any money. If you think there might be more debts than assets, the estate might be insolvent. In that case you will need professional help before you do anything else.

• If you don’t use the Tell Us Once service, contact the deceased person’s tax office to find out whether any other tax, such as Income Tax, is owed.

• Some banks offer an executor’s account into which you can transfer any money paid to the estate. This stops estate money getting confused with your personal finances.

• Before you distribute the estate, you have to pay any outstanding tax, debts or bills. It’s a good idea to place what’s called a ‘statutory notice for creditors’ in the press, allowing two months for any claims to be made. If you don’t, you and any other executor(s) are personally responsible for any claims that arise. If you place the notice, any future claims against the estate are made against the beneficiaries instead.

• Get clearance from HMRC for any Inheritance Tax, Income Tax or Capital Gains Tax liability.
Distributing the estate

These are the main tasks involved in distributing the estate:

• If the will states that a specific item of personal property is to be given (‘bequeathed’) to someone, you can do this before probate is granted, but make sure you have the item valued.

• When probate is granted, draw up estate accounts for each beneficiary, accounting for all the assets collected, income built up and any bills paid.

• Beneficiaries who are bankrupt may not be entitled to receive their inheritance from the estate. Carry out bankruptcy searches on the beneficiaries by searching on the Individual Insolvency Register (page 19). To find out more go online at www.gov.uk/search-bankruptcy-insolvency-register or call the Insolvency Service’s enquiry line on 0300 678 0015.

• Distribute the estate in accordance with the terms of the will, making sure at least two trustees are named for any gifts left to beneficiaries under 18. You may want to wait at least six months after probate is granted before distributing the estate in case any claims are made against it.

• Give each beneficiary an R185 tax form (ask the Probate and Inheritance Tax Helpline for more information – see page 20) for their share of estate income. Keep clear records of the work you’ve done, so you can answer any questions or challenges over how you administered the estate.

Next steps

Read our guide When someone dies and our factsheet Dealing with an estate for more information.
Paying any Inheritance Tax

Inheritance Tax may have to be paid on the estate if it’s worth more than the £325,000 threshold.

If a house is left to the children or grandchildren of the person who’s died, the tax-free allowance on its value increases to £475,000. After that, the tax payable is 40%.

There is no Inheritance Tax to pay on estates left to a spouse, civil partner or charity. If one partner dies and has not used their tax-free allowance, this can be passed on to the surviving partner, giving them a higher threshold of up to £950,000 before Inheritance Tax will apply.

If there could be Inheritance Tax to pay, get a professional valuation on high-value items such as a house or stock market investments, as you need to give HMRC a detailed account along with valuations. If the valuations aren’t accurate, you may have to pay penalties. List any major gifts made by the deceased person in the past seven years, as these may be liable for Inheritance Tax.

You can order an Inheritance Tax form by calling the Probate and Inheritance Tax helpline, (page 20) or go online at www.gov.uk/government/collections/inheritance-tax-forms to download one.

If necessary, you can arrange an executor’s loan account with a bank to pay Inheritance Tax. Sometimes the deceased person’s bank or building society may release money to pay Inheritance Tax without requiring a loan arrangement.
Dealing with any assets

Joint accounts
Normally, any money held in a joint account automatically transfers to the surviving joint owner. Send a death certificate to the bank so that it can update its records. The share that belonged to the person who’s died is included when calculating the value of the estate for Inheritance Tax.

Jointly owned property
If the person who’s died owned property with another person as ‘beneficial joint tenants’, their share of the property automatically passes to the surviving joint owner. The property itself doesn’t form part of the estate, but the value of the deceased person’s share in it is included when calculating the value of the estate for Inheritance Tax.

Pension schemes
If the person who’s died had a pension, contact the provider and supply a death certificate. Ask whether death benefits are payable and whether there is a pension for a spouse, civil partner or children. Confirm whether any money can be paid directly to someone, rather than forming part of the estate. If the money does form part of the estate, check whether the amount needs to be included in any Inheritance Tax return.

Life insurance policies
If the person who’s died had a life insurance policy, contact the insurance company as soon as possible to find out what you need to do before it can pay out. Confirm whether any money should be payable directly to a beneficiary, rather than forming part of the estate. If it does, check that the amount doesn’t need to be included in any Inheritance Tax return.

Debts
Collect any debts owed to the person who’s died.
